CALL FOR PAPERS

Since its inception in 1945, the United Nations (UN) has become the foremost forum to address issues that transcend national boundaries and cannot be resolved by any one country acting alone. UN has grown from the original 51 member states to its current 193 nations, acclaimed for its accomplishments and has become a multifarious organization for global governance. The year when we are celebrating 70th anniversary of UN gives an opportunity to analyze whether the institution has been able to fulfil the expectations and goals for which it was formed and contemplation about the future of the organization.

It was founded at the end of a war during which genocide had been committed on a horrific scale. Its prime objective was to prevent such a conflict from ever happening again. Additionally, its initial goals of safeguarding peace, protecting human rights, establishing the framework for international justice and promoting economic and social progress, however new challenges, such as climate change, international terrorism has been added to its agenda. While conflict resolution and peacekeeping continue to be among its most visible efforts is also engaged in a wide array of activities to improve people lives around the world.

However, critics say that the victors of World War II have been the power players since 1945. UN itself has ballooned: 85,000 bureaucrats, an annual spend of about $40bn (£26bn) – 2,000 times that of the organization’s budget during its first year in 1946. Spending had quadrupled in the past 20 years – and still several agencies struggle to balance their books. It is been criticized that since it was formed, UN has become bigger and bigger. Many organizations have overlapping mandates. In some sectors, such as water and energy, more than 20 UN agencies are active and compete for limited resources without a clear collaborative framework. More than 30 UN agencies and programs have a stake in environmental management. Cooperation between organisations has been hindered by competition for funding, mission creep and by outdated business practices.

The scholars have also pointed out that the Security Council appears increasingly incapable of delivering security: its peacekeepers can’t always keep the peace; its health body has been shown up by the Ebola epidemic, while its refugee agency is struggling to deal with record numbers of people fleeing conflict or persecution.

All countries are represented in the General Assembly; however it can only pass nonbinding resolutions. The Security Council, the most important organ of UN, doesn’t represent the world today. These permanent members of the Security Council having veto power have led to near-paralysis at the council on major crises like Syria and Ukraine. Since 1982, the US has used its Security Council veto to block resolutions critical of Israel 35 times. The total number of resolutions blocked by other permanent members over the same period is 27. More recently, Russia and China have used their vetoes to block UN intervention in Syria. India, the world’s biggest democratic nation, is pushing for expansion of the Security Council to include six more permanent members with the right of veto, as well as several more non-permanent members. However, there are no signs the big five intend to give up any power or share it with more countries.

Mr. Asoke Kumar Mukerji (Indian Ambassador to the UN) highlighted that it is incredible that in the United Nations, which produces negotiating texts on every other area it deals within the area of Security Council reform it has just not been able to put a text on the table. It is pointed out that UN of today is hugely different from the United Nations 70 years ago, and therefore it is very important the United Nations changes and adapts itself to changing circumstances.

There is widespread behind-the-scenes jockeying for top jobs in the U.N. Secretariat and U.N. agencies. Every country belongs to a regional group that lobbies to ensure it is well represented. There is often criticism that those who get the seats are not the best qualified. The developing countries have alleged that the rich countries took the high-level jobs in the name of efficiency. The secretariat of UN is dominated by industrialized economies.

The world continues to grapple with challenges posed by violent conflicts, terrorism, human migration, environmental disasters, and severe human rights violations. Islamic State, Boko Haram, Al Shabab, Al Qaeda, Lashkar-E-Taiba and other terrorist groups grab headlines and take lives with shocking brutality. The lack of rule of law in many countries has made it easier for such groups to operate and expand.

Against this background, the 70th anniversary of UN presents an opportunity to reflect on the role of international law in addressing these problems, and to evaluate the need for reform in the UN and its institutions. In remembrance of UN anniversary and its significance for international law, Amity Law School Centre-II (ALS-II) is hosting an international conference on ‘UN@70’ on 4-5 February 2016. We invite you to celebrate and discuss international concerns and major challenges to UN. Conference attendees
